Transforming Britain's Landscapes

Living Streets

Marshalls has this year joined forces with 'Living Streets', a national charity, formerly known as the Pedestrians Association, which is working towards people friendly public spaces.

LIVING STREETS

PUTTING PEOPLE FIRST

As part of this new partnership, a number of Marshalls' employees have been trained in Community Street Auditing – giving them an important insight into how the Living Streets agenda is applied to the streets and public spaces they help to create. The audits are designed to gather together and listen to street users, including the general public, residents and local authority representatives, to come up with better landscapes which will make a difference to their communities and communal areas.

Audit trainees from Marshalls have found the training useful, giving them an insight into what street users would like and what street designers need take into consideration when landscaping public areas.

A Living Streets audit trainee said: “Visiting the street and involving myself with others to decide what was good and poor in the existing street conditions was the best part.”

“The day helped me have an understanding of what architects, planners, local authorities and engineers need to consider when engaging in street design.”
